To the Editor of "The Nursing Record."

SIR, —Nurses and nursing matters are at present engrossing a larger share of public interest than they have ever received before. It is but right that they should do so, and I would predict, for several good and sufficient reasons, that this public interest will increase and extend. For instance, nurses now-a-days are utterly different from what they were twenty or thirty years ago. Sairey Gamp and Betsey Prig, of immortal memory, have vanished, and in their places stand gentlewomen of good birth and high education, large-hearted, soft-voiced, and gentle-handed, doing woman's noblest work, being "ministering angels" to the sick and the suffering. And coincidentally the art of nursing has advanced by leaps and bounds to be universally recognised as a skilled calling. I hear on the best authority (that of The Lancet) that the leaders of the medical and nursing world are joining hands with the firm determination that from henceforth nursing shall be a legally constituted profession. For the sake and welfare of the public I rejoice to hear the news. It has confirmed me in a belief, which I have held for many months, that the time has fully come for nurses to have an organ of their own in the English Press. The vast importance of the profession (as I will at once call it) of nursing to the medical men and to the general public, makes it essential that nurses, like the members of every other profession, should possess a journal absolutely and entirely devoted to their own interests. Because it is only through the press that they can give articulate voice to their views and their wishes; that they can with united strength guard their interests; that interesting and important professional intelligence can, week by week, be circulated throughout the United Kingdom, which would otherwise remain locally buried; that the strongest possible bond between British nurses the wide world over can be formed and kept and strengthened. Therefore, especially welcoming your publication, I am, Sir, yours truly and obliged,

A NURSE.
