37,000 sign our safe staffing petition. Will you?

Our petition calling on the government to fix the nursing workforce crisis in England has been signed by more than 37,000 people since our public advertising campaign launch in September. The ad, which features the picture above, has appeared in national newspapers, on digital billboards, online and on social media. It urges the public to fight for nurses.

Members were out in force at the Labour and Conservative party conferences, urging politicians to support the campaign. RCN steward Maggy Heaton went to Manchester to influence the Tories. “It’s so important we get out there and demand action from politicians,” said Maggy. “With a general election on the cards, they’ll all be vying for our votes soon. Now is the time to seek their support for safe staffing.”

It takes two minutes to add your name to our petition. Sign it at rcn.org.uk/peoplepeople-magazines

Lack of staff threatens success of Welsh law

We’ve insisted the Welsh government takes urgent action to address nurse shortages in Wales. This includes increasing opportunities for flexible working and improving access to CPD. We made the recommendations in a new briefing that shows there are an estimated 1,600 nurse vacancies in the NHS in Wales. Helen Whyley, Director of the RCN in Wales, said: “The lack of nursing staff is a real threat to meeting the requirements of the Nurse Staffing Levels (Wales) Act.”

Legal limbo in England puts patient care at risk

The RCN has published a report outlining the evidence behind its calls for specific legal responsibilities for NHS workforce planning and supply in England.

The report, titled Standing Up for Patient and Public Safety, follows the release of recent NHS figures showing there are now a record 43,671 vacant nursing posts in the NHS in England.

We’re clear that to address the number of vacancies and tackle the workforce crisis, there must be clarity on workforce roles and responsibilities and that these must be set out clearly in law.

Public back NI nurses as strike ballot nears close

Members working in Health and Social Care (HSC) services in Northern Ireland have only a few days left to decide whether to take industrial action, up to including strike action, over the nurse staffing and pay crisis there. Voting papers must be returned by 6 November. Any agreed action will start within four weeks of that date.

RCN members and staff have been spreading the word in workplaces, with bus adverts raising awareness among the public. A petition demanding the Department of Health acts to resolve the staffing crisis and pay Northern Ireland nurses what they deserve has had more than 19,000 signatures so far. Climate change: you can help make health care more sustainable

The RCN has published a statement of how it intends to help tackle the climate change crisis. It stresses the negative consequences of global warming on people’s health and says these will be catastrophic if urgent action isn’t taken.

The statement says nurses have a duty to protect and promote public health in the face of threats posed by climate change but that the health care sector, as a major contributor to global warming, must also play its part.

Members at RCN Congress in May discussed the climate emergency and how nursing staff can help achieve a low carbon health care economy. Over the next six months the RCN will consult with members and stakeholders to develop a climate change strategy.

This will focus on several approaches including identifying and sharing practical ways in which members can develop sustainable initiatives in their workplaces and lobbying for more sustainable procurement of items used by nursing staff to deliver care.

RCN Professional Lead for Sustainability Rose Gallagher said: “As the largest profession delivering health care, nursing is uniquely placed to advocate, educate and lead action to mitigate the risks associated with global warming. As a profession we can drive changes to help us practice, work and live in more sustainable ways.”

The RCN is already taking steps to help nursing staff and their employers reduce avoidable waste through initiatives such as Glove Awareness Week. It also supports members to get involved in decisions about procurement, and contribute ideas to making care more sustainable through its Small Changes, Big Differences campaign.

“There is some great work happening with members changing practices to help reduce their workplace’s carbon footprint, while improving care,” added Rose. “We’re committed to extending that to help all those involved in health care to reduce the impact on the environment of delivering such care.”

There are rumours the government is gearing up to introduce a new deal for nursing students in England to boost the number of applications to nursing degree courses. The suggestion – student loan repayment in return for NHS service – is one of two options we suggested and costed a whole year ago. We’re asking for at least £1bn per year to be invested into nursing higher education in England to help fix the workforce crisis. Join our fight: rcn.org.uk/peoplespeople-magazines

PATIENT PERSPECTIVE

Michelle says nurses made all the difference when her son was treated in A&E

It was a Friday afternoon when I got a call from the school to say my four-year-old son Max had been in an accident.

I asked the usual questions. Had he been knocked out? (No). Was he bleeding? (Yes). I flew out the door and arrived at the school to find my son clutching gauze to an inch-long gash on the top of his head.

Off to Barry Hospital we went. When we got there, we took a seat in the children's waiting room before being called in by nurse Dean, who was just wonderful with the scared four-year-old and his anxious mama. He checked his head and then sent us for an x-ray. Max was then sent to see the equally brilliant nurse Linda for stitches (luckily, we got away with glue).

As we were leaving Max got a bravery award from nurse Dean, which he was very proud of. Dean reminded us that he will see us again, whether it’s for Max or Leo (Max’s twin brother) or both, because kids will be kids!

I can’t thank the staff at the hospital enough for looking after us. Even if it was just something minor to everyone else, it was huge to us. Everyone seems to moan about the NHS but here’s the proof: the staff are absolutely fantastic!

Max has bounced back. I’m still slightly traumatised, but I know we’ll be back a hundred times over the years. I just hope we encounter the likes of nurse Dean and nurse Linda every single time.

Artists from CreativeConnection sketch the story of what happened at the RCN’s recent Black History Month conference in the West Midlands. The event was one of a number held across England in October to showcase and celebrate the contribution of black, Asian and minority ethnic nursing staff.

Each month RCN Bulletin asks a member to share a little bit about themselves

Name: Victoria Riddle (née Southgate)
Role: Community children’s nurse
Describe your job in three words: Rewarding, challenging and caring
Why did you choose the profession? I always wanted to be a nurse. I wrote to a university when I was 15 to ask how to apply.
If you weren’t a nurse, what would you be? I think I’d make a good chat show host.
What item can’t you do without at work? My diary.
What’s the best bit about your job? When you see you’ve made a difference.
What helps you through a difficult day at work? The support of colleagues – I am part of a lovely team.
How do you unwind? I enjoy swimming and love a good TV drama.
Who would play you in a film? Lisa Kudrow
What's the best lesson nursing has taught you? That everyone is different and really there’s no such thing as “normal”.

Running challenge thanks

Thank you so much for featuring my unicorn running challenge in the last issue (RCN Bulletin, issue 380, page 6). I felt very proud to be included and proud that I had achieved what I set out to do with my running. I contacted some of my former lecturers about it and one has asked me to come back to my university to give a talk about student mental health.

It was an honour to write for the RCN and promote mental health within the nursing profession, particularly with student nurses.

Speaking up about suicide

We had several responses to our article by nurse Gemma (RCN Bulletin, issue 380, page 9) who faced a fitness to practise investigation after attempting suicide. Here are a couple of them:

I have struggled with mental health issues and have been very fortunate to have had huge support from my work family. It has helped so much in my recovery and it’s a shame that some colleagues have not had that same support.

HOT TOPIC

We asked our social media followers what they think about treatment for gaming addiction being available on the NHS as the first specialist clinic is launched in London

Either people are treated for mental health issues or they’re not. It doesn’t matter whether they relate to gaming or anything else. @John110000

In a perfect world, yes. I agree the NHS is meant to be comprehensive, but where funding is already being cut on current essential services and decreased access to drugs, how do we determine what is deemed important on an already stretched health care service? @comerfordDiana

Health needs are constantly changing and we need to be able to respond to new and emerging health concerns. Although gaming disorder support should not solely be the responsibility of the NHS, it should be a collaboration with the gaming firms to build preventative measures. @CharlotteNHSRN

As with any obsession, gaming addiction can mentally, emotionally and physically affect millions of children all over the world. Without the right knowledge and understanding of these behaviours, it will definitely stimulate more harm. @trisha_pihuella

Gaming can consume. Why would public health – inclusive of the NHS – not tackle this where it tips into addiction? I think key to this issue is education: defining where that tipping point is. @EmilySm9596979

‘A smack is a hit’

As Scotland becomes the first UK country to ban smacking children, RCN member Michelle Moseley reflects on her role as an expert witness in the development of a similar law in Wales

If another adult did something we didn’t approve of, we wouldn’t hit them to make them understand they’d acted inappropriately.

We need to start applying this same rule to disciplining children. A smack is a hit. Even the term “smack” minimises what a hit is.

The Welsh Government’s bill on this issue is so important, but it’s not about criminalising parents. It’s about educating people and explaining that a smack can escalate. I’ve seen this happen in my work as a health visitor and as a safeguarding lead nurse.

Attitudes towards smacking have changed in the last couple of decades but there is a still a minority of parents who think smacking children is OK. We need to help these people understand alternative ways to discipline children. This proposed legislation in Wales would help us stress the importance of not smacking.

Parenting isn’t simple. People do lose their temper, but we can show people that walking away from a potentially difficult situation with a child can make things better. In my work on the Welsh Government Task and Finish Group, we’re developing ways to ensure people know about this bill, so parents become educated about new approaches.

I passionately believe that as nursing staff we need to use our experience, knowledge and compassion to be advocates for those who are unable to speak out for themselves.

Dame Donna Kinnair
RCN Chief Executive & General Secretary

It’s really important for us, as nursing staff, to take care of ourselves, as well as others. We must find time at work to prioritise our basic needs - drink adequate fluids, eat healthily and pass urine. These things are fundamental to us being able to deliver safe care.

Twelve-hour shifts are well known to be of concern. Most of us recognise that our concentration may be less focused after eight hours nursing in a demanding environment – yet little research has been done into this. What we do know is that night shifts can be damaging to health.

A recent Nursing Notes survey had stark results. It looked at how safe health care workers felt driving home after a night shift. Of the 2,660 respondents, 73% said they felt unsafe and 58% said this was because they didn’t have time to take their break at work.

This is unacceptable. In health care environments, where nursing staff are making important and often safety-critical decisions about patient care, work breaks are a necessity not a luxury.

Fatigue-related errors and accidents are a very real risk for shift workers and the patients they care for. A 20-minute break is the legal minimum for staff working more than six hours and for safety-critical roles, two or more longer breaks are needed. Employers must take this seriously.
Beating burnout

As national self-care week approaches, three RCN members share their research, advice and innovations on how to overcome work-related stress and fatigue.

Dr Hannah Andrews wrote her PhD thesis on self-care and self-compassion in nursing. She says there must be a change in the profession’s culture so staff give themselves permission to prioritise their own health.

How many times have you heard flight attendants say: “Put your own oxygen mask on first before assisting others?” It makes complete sense. So why do nursing staff find it difficult to care for themselves before and alongside caring for others?

Understanding that we should direct care and compassion towards ourselves is a challenging idea. We only appear to consider and use self-care as a reactive way of coping. It’s not built into our work lives. Patients are always our priority, and while many of us enter the profession to care for others, our needs shouldn’t be sacrificed while we offer compassionate care.

Our nursing identity is important here. It’s more difficult to access self-care when we find it difficult to have a sense of ourselves outside nursing.

We’re also more likely to be able to look after ourselves if we’re working in a stable or safe environment, or we feel safe within our work team. Sadly, there are many reasons why a lot of us might feel this is difficult in today’s challenging and ever-changing health care environments.

We need to give ourselves permission to proactively care for ourselves, or receive permission from someone else, such as our managers. If we do this, we’re more likely to experience a greater sense of wellbeing and to feel more equipped to manage the difficult emotions that come with our jobs.

This way of thinking needs to be embedded within nursing culture too, with permission to self-care and be self-compassionate being promoted early on in our careers.

“Our needs don’t need to be sacrificed for us to care for others.”

Newly registered nurses are seriously at risk of early career burnout at a time when we need them most. Therefore a module on self-care in the nursing curriculum and early key messages could help, so learning to look after themselves and being given permission to do so becomes part of their formal education.

The NMC Code places a focus on caring for patients and being well enough to care for patients, but we need policies and procedures in place that state self-care is not only acceptable but essential in a health care environment. Self-care needs to be a formal part of a nurses’ duty of care.

We need to know that we matter. Our needs don’t need to be sacrificed for us to care for others.

Hannah has contributed to our self-care project and the RCN’s Healthy Workplace, Healthy You campaign. Visit rcn.org.uk/healthy-workplace

Top tips for self-care

Steph White is an emergency nurse in Kent. It wasn’t until she took time off recently that she realised she was suffering from burnout. She shares her advice for looking after yourself.

1. Keep it healthy

Exercise, consider your diet and stay hydrated. If you find it difficult to motivate yourself to exercise, do something you’ll enjoy that will get you moving – a walk in the park might be as helpful as a gym session. But remember a little bit of what you fancy is OK – just avoid the guilt afterwards.

2. Write down your worries

It can help you formulate a plan to deal with the issues.

3. Get the rest you need

Not always easy but sleep deprivation takes hold and your motivation will decrease if you feel tired and drained.

4. Approach social media with caution

It’s great for keeping up to date but don’t worry unnecessarily about everyone else’s seemingly fabulous lives. Be happy for them but focus on you.

5. Get some you time

You don’t need holiday plans to book some time off work. Spend time in your home and do something you love that you haven’t done for a while.

6. Take a break from negative people

Instead find someone who will be a positive influence, whether they are someone you know personally or a positive role model in the public eye. Help to change your mindset by using positive words in your day-to-day language too.

7. Remember self-care

Work on your self-image. Remember not everything is your fault.

8. Reach out

Open up to a friend, spouse, family member, colleague, union rep, GP, or counsellor. Remember you are not alone.

9. Time for a change?

Ask yourself if it’s time to try something new. However much you love your job, it’s sometimes good to take time out to get experience in another area and return when you’ve had a break.
Nursing student Hollie Lawrence (pictured above) explains why she’s developing a trauma awareness app for health professionals

We all know it’s good to talk about the traumatic situations we’re regularly confronted with and thankfully most nurse managers stress the door is open for us to chat. While this is welcome, how we react to trauma differs from person to person and this might not be the best way for all of us to deal with these issues. Many of us are simply not confident enough to always come forward if we’ve been affected by a situation at work. Speaking out can feel like a big thing to do with some people feeling scared of identifying they have a need.

That’s why a trauma awareness app could be so helpful. Staff could remain anonymous but still get speedy access to support for trauma and how best to cope with what they’re facing.

I’m now working on developing an app to do this after winning funding and business development mentoring in a university competition. I really hope it proves to be a way to remind people that however they’re feeling, they’re not alone and their life and views matter.

I’ve also set up a website and a private Facebook group called ProVent, which already has 850 followers. It’s a place for health care staff and students to express, explore and educate each other about stress-related illness and burnout. It’s also a platform for health care-related questions, videos and relevant literature.

I know there’s a need for this kind of site because some student nurses have already told me the support they’ve received from ProVent has helped keep them in nursing.

Hollie is developing the app after winning £5,000 in funding in an Anglia Ruskin University competition. She also won three days of business mentoring in Spain, and a one-year membership of the Future Business Centre by Allia, where she is working with their team to help develop the app.

Imagine working in a place with no regard for safety. Where fire exits are blocked, slips and trips occur routinely, assaults against staff are commonplace and equipment is faulty and dangerous.

Despite legislation being in place for many years, there are still a number of health and safety issues in the workplace, including work-related stress and musculoskeletal injuries. Employers need to understand the importance of health and safety. Staff are a valuable asset so protecting them is sensible – and a legal requirement.

A safe working environment doesn’t happen by chance. It requires commitment, knowledge, partnership working, plus a lot of hard work. Which is where RCN safety reps come in. Safety reps do remarkable things, sometimes unnoticed, often behind the scenes. But the focus of everything they do is ensuring that members are able to carry out their work without risk of harm to themselves or their patients.

Cath Jones, a neonatal sister at Wrexham Maelor Hospital (pictured below), is an RCN safety rep and the role brings her immense satisfaction.

Rewarding role

“Making sure that members’ concerns have been resolved and that you’ve got a healthy workforce out there – that’s the greatest reward,” she says.

Cath works on a wide range of safety issues, from problems with heating to serious incident reviews and the implementation of safe staffing legislation. The historic Nurse Staffing Levels (Wales) Act became law in 2016.

There are also meetings to attend, inspections and assessments to carry out, and various laws and directives to digest and understand. Trade union legislation allows reps to take time off from their substantive post to carry out union duties. Even so, on top of her role in a neonatal baby unit and her work as an RCN steward, isn’t all that extra work too much to fit in?

“It is a lot but it’s thoroughly rewarding and totally enjoyable,” Cath says. “And the feedback from members is very satisfying.”

She has been a safety rep since 2008 but the training never stops. Cath doesn’t need to know about everything of course, but she does need an overview and know who and where to go for advice. RCN officers offer valuable support and close networks mean there is always someone to ask.

Safety reps are also vital cogs in the RCN’s campaign work, spreading messages about initiatives such as Rest, Rehydrate, Refuel and Healthy Workplace, Healthy You.

First point of contact

Kim Sunley supports safety reps in her role as an RCN National Officer. She says: “RCN safety reps are a first point of contact for members with safety concerns, such as workplace accidents, or issues with the working environment, including access to moving and handling equipment or responding to violent incidents.

“They work with employers to ensure relevant health and safety legislation is complied with and carry out safety inspections, contribute to risk assessments and alert colleagues to their health and safety obligations and risks. They are a vital part of the RCN’s network of workplace representatives.”

‘You don’t need to be nervous’

Dee and Tony are CQC inspectors. They’re also registered nurses and RCN members. They explain what their job involves and how they’re on the same side as nursing staff.

Dee McEvoy and her colleague Tony Cliffe (pictured above) have been registered nurses and RCN members since the 1980s. They now work full-time as inspectors for the Care Quality Commission (CQC), the independent regulator of all health and social care services in England.

“It’s a challenging and complex role,” says Dee. “Our nursing skills are important because they help us understand the environment being inspected and ensure the care being delivered is safe.”

Each CQC inspector oversees a portfolio of services, usually within a geographical area. “We have to maintain an oversight of these services, monitoring and highlighting any risks, dealing with safeguarding issues and making sure there’s a relevant inspection programme in place,” says Dee.

A lot of work happens behind the scenes before an inspection takes place, including rigorous planning and the analysis of data and information sent over by the service provider. “We also try to involve an expert by experience. This is either someone who has used the type of service we’re inspecting or who cares for someone who has,” she says.

When the time comes for Dee and Tony to enter a service, they’re mindful of putting the nursing staff they’re visiting at ease. “It’s really important that as inspectors we treat staff with dignity and respect and listen to what they have to say,” says Tony. “We don’t want people to feel pressured by the experience and we don’t want to disrupt patient care. We try our best to work with people, and to work around them, so they can continue with their job.”

“I understand that people might feel nervous but we’re not there to catch anyone out,” reassures Dee. “We’re there to ensure people receive safe, effective and responsive care. I know that nursing staff want the same for their patients.”

Though staff sometimes don’t want to speak candidly because they’re worried about the repercussions, Dee says names are never used in inspection reports or in feedback to the employer, unless a safeguarding issue has been disclosed. “We want to protect people’s anonymity, so they have the confidence to speak to us,” she says. “If you’re confident, competent and knowledgeable then you don’t need to be nervous,” confirms Tony.

Dee describes the job as satisfying and interesting but all-consuming. “The workload is immense but it’s an incredibly fulfilling job. I feel it really does make a difference. I love inspecting and ensuring people are safe.”

What makes a service outstanding?

The CQC rates services based on five key questions: are they safe, effective, caring, responsive and well-led? Services are rated on each area and given an overall rating too. There are four possible ratings: outstanding, good, requires improvement and inadequate.

Dee says: “For a service to be outstanding, we’re looking for evidence that it’s exceptional and distinct in some way. In adult social care, the difference between good and outstanding would be those creative and innovative measures that staff put in place to ensure the people being cared for in those services have meaningful and enjoyable lives.

“Care must be visibly person-centred and we’re looking for staff to demonstrate an excellent understanding of people’s cultural and social diversity. Services rated outstanding are flexible and responsive to people’s individual needs and their protected characteristics.”
In sickness and in health

Having a medical condition doesn’t mean you can’t be a great nurse, but it’s important to focus on your strengths, while recognising your limitations. We share Ana’s story.

When Ana Oliveira (pictured above) was diagnosed with muscular dystrophy (MD) it was a huge shock. Her role as a respiratory nurse at Lane Fox Remeo, the UK’s first purpose-built weaning and home ventilation centre, was a demanding job, with long shifts. The pain she was now experiencing meant she simply couldn’t do the work she needed to.

Ana was frightened. She didn’t know what to expect and she was worried she’d lose her job. But Ana had protection under the Equality Act and a forward-thinking and proactive management team. They worked with the RCN to get the best outcome for Ana, the team she worked with, and the patients she cared for.

Ana now works as a respiratory nurse and activities co-ordinator. It’s a role that makes best use of her skills. She does activities with patients, and, as many of her patients also have MD, she can put herself in their shoes and think about what she can do to help them. She also works in the office on patient discharge, unit audits and making improvements.

Thinking outside the box

Ana says it’s great to keep working in this new role and advises others in similar situations not to be afraid. “Talk with your manager and get an appointment with occupational health. I didn’t know what I could do but they were really helpful and referred me to the Access to Work programme,” she says.

“It’s important to think outside the box,” adds Head of Nursing at Lane Fox Remeo, Michelle Freeman. “Ana has a huge amount of knowledge and we didn’t want to lose her, so we looked at her skillset and what Ana could do to support the senior team.

“She’s doing a fantastic job in risk assessment, COSH management, audit and more. It’s still early days but Ana’s new role has made such a difference to supporting everyone in the clinical team. It’s good for everyone to see this isn’t the end of her career as a nurse.”

Securing the best outcome

Ana and Michelle got support from RCN Officer Catherine Garner, who helped them navigate the situation and identify what new opportunities there might be for Ana. “Partnership working is about looking at things from the other point of view,” says Catherine.

“The RCN is here to make sure members get the best possible representation and outcome. I’m aware of constraints from a manager’s point of view but sometimes we need to look at things in a different way. “In this case the managers really cared about what was right for Ana. They wanted to make sure whatever situation was suggested was positive and safe for her – it meant having difficult conversations, but it’s been a good outcome.”

The RCN peer support service is a network for members with lived experience of disability. To join, watch Ana’s story, or tell us about adjustments in your workplace visit rcn.org.uk/peersupport.

Talking transgender identity

When nurse Michael began receiving questions about gender identity from adults with learning disabilities and autism, he created a booklet to provide the answers.

“Over the last couple of years, we’ve had an increasing number of people referred to us who typically have a mild learning disability and either have transitioned or are confused about their gender identity,” says learning disability nurse Michael Fullerton.

As Clinical Director of Achieve Together, an organisation that supports people with learning disabilities and autism, he creates guidance and training on best practice within the specialty. But providing answers to questions about gender wasn’t easy: “We needed to be better informed.”

When Michael approached trans organisations for guidance, he found a similar problem. They were also seeing more people with autism seeking support, but they only had half the answers. Michael combined their expertise, running focus groups to speak to and listen to people with learning disabilities and/or autism who were trans or considering transitioning.

The groups revealed a need for information on everyday issues. From clothing, hairstyles and vocal training, to tips on talking to loved ones, navigating the health system and dealing with discrimination: “We wanted to give advice through the booklet – in terms of your voice, for example, you can go to a voice coach and there’s apps that you can use. We signpost to support organisations as well.”

Michael also discovered how the experience of a trans person with a learning disability or autism can differ from that of other trans people. “There are people in the hospital system with a gender dysphoria diagnosis, when actually, it’s not a gender dysphoria issue,” he says. “They are frustrated, because no one’s listening to or accepting what they are saying about their gender. That accumulates to them being distressed generally, and they end up with an inappropriate diagnosis.”

Enabling open discussions

“I suspect there are many people with more moderate or severe learning disabilities who might prefer to identify as another gender, but can’t express that,” Michael says. “Or we might observe signs, but we either don’t have the skills to pick them up or we ignore them.”

As part of his research, Michael found that support staff working with people with learning disabilities and autism weren’t always prepared for conversations about gender. “The booklet is designed to offer opportunities for discussions and allow people to express themselves,” Michael says. “So if learning disability nurses are using it to promote those conversations, it allows people to be open and honest about their thoughts and feelings.”

To help make this kind of conversation the norm, Michael’s made sure the booklet is available for free online. It’s now been translated into Dutch too.

Michael’s booklet has had a warm reception. He was nominated for an RCNi Nurse Award earlier this year and has received positive feedback from trans organisations and users. Already, it’s facilitated a family reunion, helping a grandfather to understand and accept his grandchild’s transition.

Michael says: “Support staff who’ve been using it have felt empowered, more informed and better equipped to have conversations with people, without worrying about saying the wrong thing.”

Staff feel better equipped to have conversations without worrying about saying the wrong thing.

Eye spy a simple solution

When a child was misdiagnosed after receiving dilating eye drops, Ophthalmic Nursing Forum member Caroline McCaffrey designed a way to prevent it happening again.

Ophthalmic patients are often given eye drops to dilate their pupils, so the whole eye can be examined, and its health assessed more accurately.

The procedure is painless, but the pupils may still be dilated hours after the drops are administered. In most cases, this isn’t a problem. But if the patient with fixed, dilated pupils is seen by a health professional who isn’t aware they’ve been given eye drops, they could be wrongly diagnosed.

When this happened at Sheffield Children’s Hospital where Ophthalmic Nursing Forum member Caroline McCaffrey works as a staff nurse in the ophthalmology department, she thought there must be a simple solution.

“Unless someone has seen the documented patient notes about the use of dilating drops, they could be alarmed if the patient has fixed dilated pupils,” she explains. “Also, if someone was involved in an accident after having eye drops, the paramedics might misdiagnose if they didn’t know.”

Caroline came up with the idea of bright yellow wristbands clearly labelled with the child’s name, and the date and time of eye drops being administered. “I worked with a designer to create the wristbands and we now use them across the whole trust,” she says. “It’s a clear, quick way to show if a child has had eye drops, especially if they are an inpatient and might be undergoing other tests or procedures.”

The wristbands are used for as long as the eyes remain dilated, then they can simply be removed and recycled. They could also be useful in schools, allowing staff to identify why a child might have blurred vision and take precautions to avoid any accidents.

This is especially important if the child’s parents don’t speak English as their first language. For young adults who’ve been treated with eye drops, the wristband can help prevent accusations of taking illicit substances.

Caroline hopes other trusts pick up the idea: “It’s not a diagnostic tool, but the wristbands are extra insurance to make sure that misdiagnosis can’t happen. The wristbands have been really well received by patients and staff alike.”

Memory serves

Members of the Defence Nursing Forum will pay tribute to nurses who have lost their lives in service to the Armed Forces this November. They’ll plant remembrance crosses at Westminster Abbey’s Field of Remembrance on 7 November and take part in the Remembrance Sunday Parade at the Cenotaph three days later.

Remembrance Day is a time to reflect on the sacrifice of Armed Forces serving personnel and their selfless dedication to their country, says forum Chair Debra Ritssperis.

“It is a great honour to protect and care for sailors, soldiers and airmen and women who put their lives on the line to secure safety and freedom for us all,” she says. “Today, nursing staff are saving lives and returning service personnel to fighting fitness around the world with routine, emergency response and critical care teams in the Middle East, New Zealand, Canada, the US, Cyprus, Europe and the UK. It is important to preserve a day to reflect on the greatness that has gone before, and the ongoing sacrifices made by so many serving personnel and their supportive families.”

IN THE SPOTLIGHT

Bladder and Bowel Forum

Who’s the Chair?
Alison Wileman became Chair of the forum in 2016 after spending four years on the steering committee and serving as the forum committee’s continence service lead. She says: “I’ve been a member since I came into the world of bladder and bowel nursing about 20 years ago.”

Recent highlights?
To celebrate the modernising of the specialty and reflect a wider scope of conditions, the forum recently changed its name from Continence Care Forum to Bladder and Bowel Forum. “This is in line with national documents and changes in what continence means,” Alison says. “It’s about healthy bladders and bowels.” The forum has also recently released new catheter care guidelines and bowel care guidance.

Visit rcn.org.uk/publications to search and download.

What’s coming up?
The forum has plans to create webinars that will accompany the updated catheter care guidelines. Members are also hoping to collaborate with the Women’s Health and Midwifery forums on a project about bladder and bowel care in childbirth.

Why join?
“There are not many bladder and bowel nurses, so being part of a network is great and very supportive,” Alison says. “Continence isn’t sexy, it’s often forgotten and isn’t always on the agenda. The forum raises the profile of bladder and bowel issues, challenges decisions, makes documents and looks at learning needs.”

Protecting liver health

The Gastrointestinal Nursing Forum has been central to the creation of a new publication called Caring for People with Liver Disease.

Liver disease is the fifth most common cause of death in the UK, and this framework offers updated professional standards for nursing staff, including guidance around liver transplantation.

Michelle Clayton, forum steering committee member, says: “All nurses, regardless of clinical background, have the skills and talents to integrate liver health into their area of practice, as a healthy liver is essential in maintaining a healthy life.”

Download the updated professional standards at rcn.org.uk/publications (code 007 733).

Future of fertility

The Fertility Nursing Forum has teamed up with the British Infertility Counselling Association to offer workshops on the advances in reproductive technology that could help patients preserve their fertility. For many young people and adults with life-limiting conditions, treatment could affect their ability to have children. The interactive workshop will equip nurses and midwives to inform and support patients and their families.

The workshop will take place at RCN Wales, 15 November, 9.45am–2.30pm. For more information contact nicola.mills@rcn.org.uk

WHAT I’M THINKING

Jason Warriner
Chair, Public Health Forum

At RCN Congress 2019, the Public Health Forum proposed a resolution on violence reduction and prevention following the increase in violent knife crime across the UK. This resolution led to a working group, looking at the potential role and contribution of nursing and midwifery in reducing violent crime and, most importantly, prevent it happening in future.

Across the UK there are numerous projects and schemes utilising the skills of nurses and midwives to undertake research and develop innovative services. The focus of many of these is to prevent people from committing crimes in the first place, reduce the risk of reoffending and support victims of crime.

The working group is made up of many organisations, from the NHS to charity sector, involving nurses who work with children and young people, in criminal justice, public health and those who have experience working with gangs or on violence-reduction projects.

At present we are looking to build a resource of case studies and good practice. If you are a nurse, midwife or health care support worker working in violence reduction and prevention, we would like to hear about your work. We want to share your knowledge and experiences with others and develop best practice.

London

Developing practice in orthopaedics and fracture trauma

10 December
RCN HQ
20 Cavendish Square
London W1G 0RN

This five-hour workshop aims to enhance and update skills for nursing professionals working in this specialty. Counting towards CPD for revalidation, this event from the RCN Society of Orthopaedic and Trauma Nursing (SOTN), includes two expert speakers and three practice-focused workshops.

Sonya Clarke, Chair of the SOTN says: “Our aim is to provide delegates with an opportunity to further develop their professional knowledge and clinical skills while reflecting on their existing practice and career goals.

“The event provides a space to network with nursing colleagues in similar roles, meet new people, and learn about other areas of the specialty. It always proves popular with delegates.”

The workshops include an update for skills and knowledge in casting; caring for a patient with a potential spinal injury; and the latest guidance on tissue viability.

Bouncing back from the bad days

Life coach and former nurse Mandy Day-Calder talks about tapping into your inner strength to overcome workplace challenges and develop resilience

Like many of you, operating at 100 miles per hour is my norm when juggling work-life priorities. But I then find it hard to switch off when on a break, and my inability to unwind can lead to feelings of guilt and frustration.

For me, talking about how I am feeling helps. I also make a conscious effort to focus on what I need to do to “boost” myself. Instead of beating myself up, I focus on what has helped in the past and what I can take control of to increase my confidence.

The lyrics in the song Soulmate by US singer Lizzo include a line about being your own soulmate – this is exactly what all of us need to do to find our way through the difficult times, both in and out of work.

Take charge of your responses

It is easy to blame systems or other people for how you are feeling, but only you can take charge of your emotional response to situations. This doesn’t mean issues such as constant under-staffing aren’t stressful, of course they are. But you can’t magic extra nurses out of thin air or find a solution to the NHS budget. What you can do is take charge of your own responses by tapping into your inner strength and resilience.

The Nursing and Midwifery Council standards of proficiency for registered nurses recognise resilience as a quality needed by nurses, especially in areas of accountability, safety and care quality.

The standards state that at the point of registration, the nurse will be able to “acknowledge the need to accept and manage uncertainty and demonstrate an understanding of strategies that develop resilience in self and others”.

Resilience is the ability to bounce back from the bad days, learn from experience and reflect on and put into practice what enables you to cope. But, as with other skills in your nursing toolkit, it’s important to remember that resilience can be developed, and that it’s perfectly normal to have days, even weeks, where you feel less resilient.

Nurses’ working lives are demanding and all-consuming, and you deserve to unwind and forget about it all when you are on a break. But switching off can be hard work, and you may have to dig deep to find ways to manage your emotions.

One of the things I love about the activities I do is how much I learn about myself by meeting my fears head on. In my dog agility club, my trainer talks about metaphorically putting on our “big girl (or boy) pants” and being brave and challenging ourselves.

We are often far stronger and more capable than we give ourselves credit for. So, next time you walk on to your shift, imagine wearing your confident pants – how would you feel and what would you do differently?

Ask yourself what you can do to feel more confident. What will enable you to cope on a day-to-day basis and what do you need to get rid of? Ultimately, you need to determine what is stopping you from being your own soulmate and what you might do to address this.

Find out more

Emotional strength will be explored at the RCNi Nursing and Careers Jobs Fair in Leicester on 5 November where a session on building resilience will be one of many practical workshops. Visit careersandjobsfair.com/leicester

REHABILITATION CASE MANAGER

Locations: Various Locations across England and Wales

We are a multi award winning UK wide Rehabilitation Case Management Company. We are an organically grown, independently owned business with a transparent vision and integrated values.

We are looking to recruit a registered professional with a background in areas such as brain injury, neurological and/or complex orthopaedic conditions. Rehabilitation Case Management experience is not essential as a full and comprehensive induction will be provided. You will need to be innovative, flexible, have first class communication and interpersonal skills, confident to work independently and as part of a multidisciplinary team and align with our company values.

This is an exciting opportunity to utilise your clinical skills and experience, in a commercial environment to help our clients reach their rehabilitation goals. You will be assessing clients who have sustained injuries of a complex nature with complex health and social care needs. You will be navigating and managing clients through their rehabilitation journey, addressing their needs, through development of collaborative rehabilitation programmes in conjunction with a variety of treating healthcare professionals and communication with all stakeholders.

Our Rehabilitation Managers work from their own home base but travel regularly to meet their clients. They meet as a team at every opportunity and have regular training events to ensure they continue to develop both individually and as a team.

Competitive salary, car allowance and multiple training opportunities including CPD accredited training.

To find out more please email your CV along with a contact number to recruitment@proclaim-care.co.uk or call 01698 892 585.
