NURSE WHO HAS NO ONE SHOULD TRY TO HELP

REVOLUTIONISED CARE IN THE CELLS

If we can get on top of someone’s problems, it could stop them from reoffending.

Jess, who last month became the first criminal justice nurse to be made a fellow of the Royal College of Nursing, has revolutionised care in the cells.

In 2008, no one should die in custody. “This is a new area of nursing and everyone who works in this field faces challenges, some more obvious and straightforward than others. The project is due to finish this summer and the final report will be published in the autumn.”

It could be a woman who is being abused by her husband and has tried to end her own life because she has been trafficked from abroad and has nowhere to go.

A cell in the back of the police station for someone with mental health issues can be extremely distressing and might push someone to the edge, so you need to take a step back and assess their mental state.

She added: “Don’t get me wrong: I love my job because it keeps me on my toes. It can be tough, but if you can get on top of problems before they become too severe, it could stop them offending again.

“We often see things and changes in how people behave before it has filtered down to other front-line services. There are people who really want to change and need the right support.”

JESS on her job

That’s why we’re here.

REVOLUTIONISED CARE IN THE CELLS

If we can get on top of someone’s problems, it could stop them from reoffending.

Jess, who last month became the first criminal justice nurse to be made a fellow of the Royal College of Nursing, has revolutionised care in the cells.

In 2008, no one should die in custody. “This is a new area of nursing and everyone who works in this field faces challenges, some more obvious and straightforward than others. The project is due to finish this summer and the final report will be published in the autumn.”

It could be a woman who is being abused by her husband and has tried to end her own life because she has been trafficked from abroad and has nowhere to go.

A cell in the back of the police station for someone with mental health issues can be extremely distressing and might push someone to the edge, so you need to take a step back and assess their mental state.

She added: “Don’t get me wrong: I love my job because it keeps me on my toes. It can be tough, but if you can get on top of problems before they become too severe, it could stop them offending again.

“We often see things and changes in how people behave before it has filtered down to other front-line services. There are people who really want to change and need the right support.”

JESS on her job

That’s why we’re here.

REVOLUTIONISED CARE IN THE CELLS

If we can get on top of someone’s problems, it could stop them from reoffending.

Jess, who last month became the first criminal justice nurse to be made a fellow of the Royal College of Nursing, has revolutionised care in the cells.

In 2008, no one should die in custody. “This is a new area of nursing and everyone who works in this field faces challenges, some more obvious and straightforward than others. The project is due to finish this summer and the final report will be published in the autumn.”

It could be a woman who is being abused by her husband and has tried to end her own life because she has been trafficked from abroad and has nowhere to go.

A cell in the back of the police station for someone with mental health issues can be extremely distressing and might push someone to the edge, so you need to take a step back and assess their mental state.

She added: “Don’t get me wrong: I love my job because it keeps me on my toes. It can be tough, but if you can get on top of problems before they become too severe, it could stop them offending again.

“We often see things and changes in how people behave before it has filtered down to other front-line services. There are people who really want to change and need the right support.”

JESS on her job

That’s why we’re here.

REVOLUTIONISED CARE IN THE CELLS

If we can get on top of someone’s problems, it could stop them from reoffending.

Jess, who last month became the first criminal justice nurse to be made a fellow of the Royal College of Nursing, has revolutionised care in the cells.

In 2008, no one should die in custody. “This is a new area of nursing and everyone who works in this field faces challenges, some more obvious and straightforward than others. The project is due to finish this summer and the final report will be published in the autumn.”

It could be a woman who is being abused by her husband and has tried to end her own life because she has been trafficked from abroad and has nowhere to go.

A cell in the back of the police station for someone with mental health issues can be extremely distressing and might push someone to the edge, so you need to take a step back and assess their mental state.

She added: “Don’t get me wrong: I love my job because it keeps me on my toes. It can be tough, but if you can get on top of problems before they become too severe, it could stop them offending again.

“We often see things and changes in how people behave before it has filtered down to other front-line services. There are people who really want to change and need the right support.”

JESS on her job

That’s why we’re here.

REVOLUTIONISED CARE IN THE CELLS

If we can get on top of someone’s problems, it could stop them from reoffending.

Jess, who last month became the first criminal justice nurse to be made a fellow of the Royal College of Nursing, has revolutionised care in the cells.

In 2008, no one should die in custody. “This is a new area of nursing and everyone who works in this field faces challenges, some more obvious and straightforward than others. The project is due to finish this summer and the final report will be published in the autumn.”

It could be a woman who is being abused by her husband and has tried to end her own life because she has been trafficked from abroad and has nowhere to go.

A cell in the back of the police station for someone with mental health issues can be extremely distressing and might push someone to the edge, so you need to take a step back and assess their mental state.

She added: “Don’t get me wrong: I love my job because it keeps me on my toes. It can be tough, but if you can get on top of problems before they become too severe, it could stop them offending again.

“We often see things and changes in how people behave before it has filtered down to other front-line services. There are people who really want to change and need the right support.”

JESS on her job

That’s why we’re here.

REVOLUTIONISED CARE IN THE CELLS

If we can get on top of someone’s problems, it could stop them from reoffending.

Jess, who last month became the first criminal justice nurse to be made a fellow of the Royal College of Nursing, has revolutionised care in the cells.

In 2008, no one should die in custody. “This is a new area of nursing and everyone who works in this field faces challenges, some more obvious and straightforward than others. The project is due to finish this summer and the final report will be published in the autumn.”

It could be a woman who is being abused by her husband and has tried to end her own life because she has been trafficked from abroad and has nowhere to go.

A cell in the back of the police station for someone with mental health issues can be extremely distressing and might push someone to the edge, so you need to take a step back and assess their mental state.

She added: “Don’t get me wrong: I love my job because it keeps me on my toes. It can be tough, but if you can get on top of problems before they become too severe, it could stop them offending again.

“We often see things and changes in how people behave before it has filtered down to other front-line services. There are people who really want to change and need the right support.”

JESS on her job

That’s why we’re here.

REVOLUTIONISED CARE IN THE CELLS

If we can get on top of someone’s problems, it could stop them from reoffending.

Jess, who last month became the first criminal justice nurse to be made a fellow of the Royal College of Nursing, has revolutionised care in the cells.

In 2008, no one should die in custody. “This is a new area of nursing and everyone who works in this field faces challenges, some more obvious and straightforward than others. The project is due to finish this summer and the final report will be published in the autumn.”

It could be a woman who is being abused by her husband and has tried to end her own life because she has been trafficked from abroad and has nowhere to go.

A cell in the back of the police station for someone with mental health issues can be extremely distressing and might push someone to the edge, so you need to take a step back and assess their mental state.

She added: “Don’t get me wrong: I love my job because it keeps me on my toes. It can be tough, but if you can get on top of problems before they become too severe, it could stop them offending again.

“We often see things and changes in how people behave before it has filtered down to other front-line services. There are people who really want to change and need the right support.”

JESS on her job

That’s why we’re here.

REVOLUTIONISED CARE IN THE CELLS

If we can get on top of someone’s problems, it could stop them from reoffending.

Jess, who last month became the first criminal justice nurse to be made a fellow of the Royal College of Nursing, has revolutionised care in the cells.

In 2008, no one should die in custody. “This is a new area of nursing and everyone who works in this field faces challenges, some more obvious and straightforward than others. The project is due to finish this summer and the final report will be published in the autumn.”

It could be a woman who is being abused by her husband and has tried to end her own life because she has been trafficked from abroad and has nowhere to go.

A cell in the back of the police station for someone with mental health issues can be extremely distressing and might push someone to the edge, so you need to take a step back and assess their mental state.

She added: “Don’t get me wrong: I love my job because it keeps me on my toes. It can be tough, but if you can get on top of problems before they become too severe, it could stop them offending again.

“We often see things and changes in how people behave before it has filtered down to other front-line services. There are people who really want to change and need the right support.”

JESS on her job

That’s why we’re here.